

Her mother saw her up there and told her to get down immediately because she could fall and break an arm. But, Lola kept moving up the roof until she found the problem. She only had to move a tile that had been loosened by the wind. It was an easy task to fix, but it was still risky.

It is necessary to emphasize that it is part of Lola's character to act childishly at times and more adultlike at others. Her impulsive way often means that she does not measure the risks and consequences.

Fortunately, this time there was not an accident, and Lola was able to fix the roof without much difficulty.

Slowly, she climbs down the ladder by the garden. The problem is solved. Her mother doesn't seem very happy, even though her adventure ended well. Will there be a reprimand? Maybe a punishment? What do you think?
